And this, as we have seen, is best figured by us through the element in our own lives which we call our highest purposes and ideals. There is nothing therefore to justify the criticism commonly brought against him by pragmatic writers that he undermines the value of human effort by making it meaningless reproduction of results already attained in an eternal world. It was no part of the Idealism with which his name is identified to maintain that we are unnecessary to the divine plan, or to deny that in knowledge as it may be realized by us a new result is achieved, new possibilities come to light, that out of the treasure house of the eternal are brought forth things that are at once old and new.
