CHEMICAL OPERATIONS AND APPARATUS. 254. The very prevalent notion, that a laboratory, fitted up with furnaces, and expensive and complicated instruments, and c. and c. , is absolutely necessary for the performance of chemical experiments, is exceedingly erroneous. In fact, the truth of the matter is diametrically opposite to this opinion. For general and ordinary chemical purposes, says Dr. Henry, and even for the prosecution of new and important inquiries, very simple means are sufficient: some of the most interesting facts of the science may be exhibited and ascertained with the aid merely of Florence flasks, of common phials, and of wine glasses. In converting these to the purposes of apparatus, a considerable saving of expense will accrue to the experimentalist; and he will avoid the encumbrance of various instruments, the value of which consists in show rather than real utility. It is a...
